Brian Edwards started his career in clinical psychology, where he often served as a court-appointed counselor for mentally ill patients. And while he found professional satisfaction from helping his clients, he came to realize that he could have more of an impact by advocating for them in the court room.

With his listening and conflict resolution skills, honed through his years as a therapist, and because he's driven by a desire to help people who are going through difficult transitions, he chose family law.

"This is the area of law that really matters the most. It touches on the most fundamental pieces of peoples' lives: their family, their children, and their financial security."

Brian relates to his family law clients with genuine understanding, and he is especially effective in high conflict cases. He has significant trial experience and is particularly knowledgeable in non-parental custody and de facto parentage matters. He feels most gratified when he can improve the welfare of children.

Brian and his wife are new parents to a son. Though the baby keeps them busy, they still find time to volunteer every weekend at the Seattle Humane Society. They have fostered many kittens, including their own cat, a "foster fail" they named Scamp. He enjoys reading general fiction, playing soccer and tennis on the weekends, and dining out with his wife.

"I was very impressed with Brian's knowledge base in family law. He is direct, to the point, and fierce with his representation. He works very hard and is passionate about helping his clients."

"Upon meeting with Brian, I had an immediate sense of relief. He gave a realistic and very honest opinion about my situation. I was left with a clear idea of what my options were, and choosing to move forward with Brian's help was a great decision. He listened well, was quick to respond to any issues, had a good understanding of the challenges we as his clients were enduring, and interacted with us in a manner that left us feeling confident, as opposed to defeated and drained. It's been refreshing to have Brian in our corner and I highly recommend him."
