Early in her legal career, Carry Porter worked to bring running water to Native American reservation homes. This work made her feel that she was making a positive contribution in the lives of others. This, in turn, led her to family law as a career choice, knowing that her advocacy on behalf of her clients would enable them to begin a better life.

"Making a concrete difference in the daily lives of others was a major deciding factor in converting to family law. It's a privilege to be able to help people create a life for themselves that is new and exciting."

Carry states that she likes to be "over prepared" for her cases. She makes certain that her clients feel the same way. And while she is a tenacious litigator, she tries to avoid litigation whenever possible.

Passionate about working with domestic violence survivors, Carry has served as a Family Law Fellow with the Eastside Legal Assistance Program. She is gratified when she can help those who are emerging from various forms of abuse when ending a relationship.

"I have found great joy in helping people find their voice, their footing, and themselves again."

In addition to cases involving domestic violence, Carry is a leading practitioner in the area of minor guardianship, formerly referred to as nonparental custody. She wrote the chapter on the new law governing these cases for the Washington Lawyer's Practice Manual and has educated other attorneys on the topic.

On top of her family law practice, Carry is mediator who serves as a neutral facilitator of family law negotiations. She also resolves family law matters as an arbitrator.

Carry has volunteered with the Mountaineers for twenty years teaching climbing, kayaking, and hiking. She also loves motorcycling and is learning how to ride a dirt bike.

"Carry has been an amazing asset to us throughout an ongoing family law battle. She has represented us in court several times and her verbal arguments are always top notch. She has helped us immensely in dealing with a high conflict family court case. Carry is calm, straight forward, detail oriented, sincere and genuine in everything she has done for us. "

"Carry guided me through a confusing, frustrating process, gave fantastic advice, calmed me down when stressful incidents happened and helped keep moving things in my case along. Her knowledge of the legal process was top notch. She knew what reasonable resolutions were that a court would reach and that gave me the confidence to reach an equitable solution in mediation. She knew what was worth taking to trial and what wasn't and that helped keep my case out of court. I would re-hire her in an instant."
